"To date, the department has not received any official request for building safe rooms," officials told Newsweek. But a program to build safe rooms has been discussed, and the Defense Department is developing a system to warn military bases about potential nuclear attacks. Some defense officials believe the United States is at risk of a nuclear attack because it is "highly vulnerable" to a strike in the volatile Middle East. The safe room concept is part of the Pentagon's reaction plan to a "high-consequence event" -- an attack that could kill up to 400,000 people or cause tens of millions of dollars of damage. The plan is in development. The Defense Department said it does not discuss contingency plans. "If a president were to issue an order for the secretary of defense to make recommendations on safe rooms, that would be one way we would react," a defense official said. One option under consideration would be to build a shelter inside a missile silo, but the safe room program can be used in any possible high-consequence event. If the U.S. and its allies were attacked, commanders could take shelter in safe rooms inside military bases around the world. Most bases have a warning system that an air raid is incoming and, if the base is safe, it will alert fighter jets that are in the air to intercept potential nuclear missiles. Defense officials said a safe room should be built in the basement of a building, away from windows so that blast waves from incoming warheads would not destroy the building. Another option is to have a decoy shelter built on an island, with multiple shelters spread around a particular area. One popular location for nuclear shelters is an underground S-400 missile base at Vandenberg Air Force Base, near Los Angeles. Those at other bases in the West Coast could also be used. The program is being worked on by the Missile Command, which is part of the Strategic Command. to learn from mass protests," says Al-Alimi, perhaps. The analyst adds that these kinds of protests, which are happening now, are the first mass struggles that will create the framework for what will be done
